> There Must Be A Reason For This

COR the 12 months ending May, 1937, residential customers in 75 per cent of the towns and communities served by Alabama Power Company used electricity in amounts substantially greater than the national average.

In March, 1937,* the national average annual electricity consumption per residential customer was 743 kilowatt hours. In June of 1937, the average annual use of electricity per Alabama Power Company residential customer was 1,222.3 kilowatt hours, or almost two-thirds more than the national average!

What Can Be The Reasons For This?

Is it, perhaps, the dependable, reliable service furnished our customers? Or, possibly, the low rate at which they have for years been able to buy electricity? Or is it likely that the company's policy of constantly introducing new electrical appliances to lighten household tasks played some part?

Or is it a combination of all these things that have created among Alabama Power Company customers that degree of satisfaction with electric service and its cost that has made Alabama outstanding in the large amount of electricity used by her residents and the low price they pay for it?
